WEDGED IN A SEWER PIPE.

A Game of Hide-and-Seek Which Nearly Resulted Fatally.

Strung along the corner of Cherry street in Ardmore, Pa., are a number of clay sewer pipes. About dusk a few days ago, a crowd of children among them Mamie Kaylor, daughter of Councilman Kaylor, for the fourth ward, were amusing themselves scampering over the pipes. This sport grew tame and some one of them thought there was more excitement in playing "hide-and-seek." Little Mamie Kaylor, like the other children, would crawl into the pipes and hide. After the game had proceeded for some time it was noticed by the other children that Mamie was missing. While they were searching for her they heard muffled screams from the interior of one of the sections of pipe. Running to it Mamie was discovered wedged in. The other children tried to release the girl by pulling but their efforts only added to the pain she was enduring as well as to tighten the hold of the pipe. Some men were attracted by the cries and the efforts of the children to release Mamie. They carried the pipe into the saloon of John Diskreider. Here they tilted the heavy pipe and tried to shake out the little one, but without success. The child was fast becoming faint from pain and fright and the men decided to break the crock. This was a delicate job, for a chance blow might break the child's leg or do more serious damage. It was determined to chip the clay pipe, beginning at the end where Mamie's feet were. With a mallet the chipping process began, when suddenly the crock split squarely in half and the child was liberated.

A TRAVELING SPARROW.

It Builds Its Nest in the Drawhead of a Freight Car.

The queer places chosen by birds for building their nests and rearing their young have caused comment in many of the natural histories now in use, but out of them all there is no more remarkable instance of the misguided efforts of the birds quoted than was exhibited in the Western New York and Pennsylvania yards at Oil City. A Western New York and Pennsylvania freight train came down from Olean the other day with a load of empty cars, among them an Allegheny Valley railroad car, No. 2,972. One of the car inspectors was passing the car when he noticed a sparrow fluttering about the drawhead. Its evident distress caused him to examine the car closely, and in the inside of the neck of the drawhead he found a small hole in the iron casing, and in this a bird's nest containing four eggs. The nest was so situated that the bird could only reach it when the drawhead was drawn to its entire length, and how the bird had managed to build its nest and lay its eggs under the conditions is still a mystery. In the car had been sidetracked at Olean long enough to allow the nest building, then the bird must have followed the train or been brought with it from Olean.

Arresting Development.

The "wrigglers" in standing water, which afterward develop into mosquitoes, can always be killed by pouring a few drops of any kind of oil, coal oil will answer, on the surface of the water. The insects breathe through their tails, and when the water is covered with oil their air tubes become clogged and they die of suffocation.

Like Pige at a Trough.

Gormandizing competitions used to be a popular form of entertainment in Alaska. An immense trough was filled with meats, bear and mountain goat, fish, berries and oil. Then families vied with one another as to who could eat the most, and many serious fights have resulted from the jealousy of the losers.
